

Thursday, February 08, 2007

Norquist;; Bush's Advisers Telling Him 'Invade Iran. Then Everyone Will See How Smart We Are'

In this month's issue of Vanity Fair, Craig Unger writes that the same neoconservative advisers who advocated for the Iraq war are now recycling the same tactics to push for the bombing of Iran. Unger reports that not all of Bush's key conservative allies are pleased with the administration's course on Iran:

"Everything the advocates of war said would happen hasn't happened," says the president of Americans for Tax Reform, Grover Norquist, an influential conservative who backed the Iraq invasion. "And all the things the critics said would happen have happened. [The president's neoconservative advisers] are effectively saying, 'Invade Iran. Then everyone will see how smart we are.' But after you've lost x number of times at the roulette wheel, do you double-down?"

More here

Posted by Stewart Rhodes at 8:35 AM

Labels: Draft, Iran, Iraq, president Bush, Terrorism, War

Newer Post

Home

Older Post

Subscribe to: Post Comments \(Atom\)

